RACHMANINOFF VERY LIBERAL

Pianist Takes Generous Stand Regarding Interpretation of Compositions

In an interview granted to a representative of a well known music magazine, Mr. Rachmaninoff who plays at the Park theater Monday night is quoted as follows:

"Have I any special feeling as to how other pianists play my compositions? To be quite honest, no. You see, when it comes to the average pianist-I am perfectly willing to let him play my pieces just as he chooses—especially if I am not there to hear him!

"I know that the composer is often supposed to have a definite feeling as to just how one or another of his compositions should be played. I know how I would play them myself, but it is all one to me how someone else chooses to interpret them. For any master pianist, any really fine pianist, is justified in finding his own interpretation, and putting his own personality into the interpretation of a composition. I indicate my own feeling about tempo, phrasing and dynamic shading in the music itself, and this is the outline of my conception.

"But some great pianist may play my piano pieces with many differences of detail, with nuances and shadings I might not use myself; and yet his conception of the piece as a whole will never be wrong, because his own good taste and musical instinct would guard against it. And it is most interesting, at times, to see how some other pianist will give a piece you have written yourself an entirely different musical color, or present it from quite another angle of interpretation than your own."

No. 41. The Early Mills.

By MRS. CLOA A. FULLER.

The hand-mills described in an earlier article were discarded for a community grist and saw-mill, built on the property of John and Phineas Hill, at Mill Creek Falls (now Lanterman's Falls) in 1798. This was the first mill in the Western Reserve.

When Hill purchased his land of John Young, his contract required him "to erect a saw-mill and something which would grind corn, within eighteen months."

The Hills let the contract for the building of the mill, in 1797, to Abraham Powers—who was a practical millwright — and his son Isaac Powers, who was with Phineas Hill, and Alfred Wolcott, the surveyor, on that Sunday morning in August, 1797, when "they came to a rocky ledge along the Mahoning river, with a water-fall of twenty-seven feet, with what appeared to be an inexhaustible supply of water." They were the first white men to discover the Falls.

The virgin forest nearby provided the "round logs" for the building. The cutting was done by Isaac Powers and John Noggle. The great mill-stones were found where Holmes Street crosses Lincoln Avenue and were split and dressed by Abraham Powers, who also installed the machinery.

Powder was used for the first time on the Reserve, to remove rock for "putting in foundations, and cutting the head-race," for this mill.

An incident in connection with the blasting for this mill, illustrates the happy vein of humor, which permeated and sweetened the most difficult tasks, in those early pioneer days. "The man in charge of blasting was not very skillful. The priming of one charge burned, but failed to explode the charge. Determined not to lose the hole, he commenced drilling out the tamping. The other men were at dinner in a cabin near where the residence of German Lanterman now stands, when they heard a terrific explosion. They rushed to the rescue thinking he had been blown to bits and found him thirty feet away, lying on his back and stunned by the concussion. The party gathered around in pity at his untimely end. But coming to his senses, he vehemently protested that he was not dead. When asked why he did not get up the ready-witted Irishman replied; 'I am watching my drill to see where it will fall'."

The citizens of Warren depended on this mill until 1802, when they dammed the Mahoning and constructed a mill of their own. The saw-mill, which was housed in the same building, was of the old-fashioned, water-wheel type, "which artists love to paint, but which no man today would run." The mill was not completed until 1798-99. There were only ten families here then and for the "raising" it was necessary to send to Greensburg, Pennsylvania, for "hands."

All the community participated. Frederick Ague killed a bear, someone else contributed the inevitable "keg of whisky," and the "women-folk" baked the corn-pone and prepared as much of a feast as possible from their primitive store.

This mill was replaced by a larger and better one, built by Eli Baldwin, the father of Hon. Jesse Baldwin, of Boardman, Ohio, and Mr. Homer Baldwin, about 1823. In the summer of 1843, this mill and other mills in Mill Creek were carried away by a flood, which destroyed some lives and much property.

The present Lanterman's mill was begun in 1844, completed in 1846. The name was changed to Lanterman's Falls as the mill was erected by German Lanterman, son of Peter Lanterman, and Samuel Kimberly. It, was operated as a flouring mill, until 1888, and was purchased by the park commissioners in 1892, with the intention of preserving it as a historic relic.

"The Little Green Man." The reading is being given to further interest in Children's Book Week, a week devoted to advertising good books for children, and is open to any children and their parents who are interested.

ASK U. S. TO PROBE MERGER OF BAKERIES

(By the International News Service)

Washington, Nov. 14.—Attorney General Stone was asked today by the People's Reconstruction League if the Department of Justice had authority to investigate the pending merger of bakery interests into the Continental Baking Co. In a letter to the Attorney General, Benjamin C. Marsh, secretary of the league, suggested an inquiry to "determine whether its purpose or probable results will be to increase the price of bread to consumers and thereby to be in restraint of trade."
